That the Corruption of the best Things becomes the worst; and this, I think, appears in nothing more clearly than in our modern Way of writing Characters. For whereas nothing is more instructive, or more entertaining, as these kind of Portrastures, when skilling and faithfully drawn; so it is not easy to imagine more entertaining, as these kind of Portrastures, when skilling more capable of deceiving the Understanding, and paisoning the Affections, than this rety Method of Characterizing, when melicipusly applied. It is, in short, the most complear Violation of the Ninth Commandment; which, it I am rightly informed, runs steraily thus. Those shalls use rife up a falle times against thy Neighbour; which is the most embatick Description that can be given of such a Writer. He does not stay till be is called, but he rises, or rather in Passions stir him up, not to speak the Truth for the site of Justice, but to spread the Idol of his own Intestion, and to show the Character of his Neighbour in thise Light to the People. file Light to the People.

the most elegant, but one of the most instructive forks of Antiquity. Here we see what Satyr ought to a because here we see the Characters of the Vicious, whout any Injury done to particular Men. The Phies, in which, if they were guilty, they might fee henfelves, and, by a View of their Deformities, be led a Amendment. For there is this Difference between to Bierrifles of the Body, and the Defects of the Mind, t whereas the former are not, the latter are in our ower, and every Man may be a Beauty if he pleases.

Many of our modern Writers take quite a contrary Many of our modern Writers take quite a contrary lethod, because they have an Incention opposite to his; by write with a Design not to instruct, but to exose; their View is not to raise a Hatred against Vice, it an Aversion to particular Men, and therefore they once exhibit the Faults they find, but attribute such builties to the Persons they describe, as in their own pinion will render them most odious. For this Reason, a philosophic Characters ought to be esteemed the most seal, so this Sorr of positical Daubing ought, in the philosophic Characters ought to be esteemed the most field, so this Sort of political Daubing ought, in the pinion of every candid, generous, and well-meaning in, to pass for the very worst kind of Practice that the Pen or Pencil can be employ'd in. It ought to distinguished from hasty or passionate Reproach, as a Law distinguishes Man-slaughter from Murder; the mer is in form Measure excused, as flowing from a dden Start of Temper, whereas the latter proceeds in a premeditated Design of destroying, and therefore, o'it may sometimes meet with, yet it has not the start of Forgiveness.

This Crime resembles Murder too in another Respect, it is, that where there are Minds black enough to neither the period of committing it, no Armour can is that where there are Minds black enough to keive a Defign of committing it, no Armour can be a fufficient Defence against it. Valo are the finest complishments, useless the most illustrious Virtues; as it is in the Power of the meanest Affassia to despite greatest, so the best of Men are always in the act were not the lowest Scribbler in this Way. So the greatest, so the best of Men are always in the the even of the lowest Scribbler in this Way. Soto, the worthiest of all the ancient Philosophere, in the of all his good Qualities, notwithstanding his inmiles Behaviour, and the Purity of his Manners, had any his Reputation torn to Pieces, but his Life taken they a Couple of pitiful Declaimers, who had exerd themselves in thir kind of Picture drawing.

It was in himself a Man of the greatest Piety, had justed and truest Notions of moral Vastues, and had a more towards cultivating human Reason, and the dis of Men, than all the Sages that went before him as befoliete Athess, one who debauch'd the Manners, computed the Understandings of his Disciples. The b, to whom they shewed the Picture, were mad egh to think it like him, and, in that Fit of Madness, demn'd the Original, who suffer'd, 'tis true, but for ament; Posterny has done Justice since to him and hem. We pay to his Mennery every Thing short of taxion, and we scarce think any Punishment bad eth for them, except Damnation itself.

Then one restes a consumer of the whore one seement. the for them, except Damnation itself.

when one reflects cooly upon this, when one ternem-what every bad Man has a Power of doing, and ittle the Best are exempted from suffering, ought to check us in giving Credit to such kind of invision Characters, and surnish an Antidote to every Poifon of the Sort. Would any Man be content the World should frame an Opinion of him from the Report of his most bitter Advertary, or would be think it fair to ask another Man's Enemy for his true Character? If not, how can he reconcile to himself shewing the least Indulgence to such Pirces, or why should be subject himself to that elegant Reproof of the Savyrist,

The Reader's Malice belps the Writer's out.

It is the Duty of fuch as have any Regard to their own Reputation, to be tender of other Men's. Whenever a Character is fit before them, they ouget to confider with what View it is written, to what Rad preever a Character is let before them, they ouget to confider with what View it is written, to what End prefented them to read. It thould be their first Enquiry, whether he who drew it had a just Call; their next, whether he has proper Skill. It would be ridiculous to expect a Likeness from a Painter who had never seen the Object he pretended to depict; but is there less Folly in believing a Writter should be able to strike out the moral Likeness of one with whom he never convers'd, with whose Thoughts he is unacquainted, whose Discourses he never heard, of whose Actions he can be no proper ludge; but above all, can there be any Madness proper Judge; but above all, can there be any Madness equal to that of believing a Man who is known to have an Interest in deceiving, who speaks with no other View, and who loses his Time if he does not make you lose the contract of the c

These, I consess, are but a sew loose and hasty Thoughts, upon a very important Subject; but loose and hasty as they are, they will sufficiently answer my Purpose, if they oblige the ingenious Reader to consider the Topick attentively. I have no finister Aim, no hidden Point to constitute the transfer of the transfer attentively. den Point to carry; and therefore, as I am fure it is needless to take much Pains to convince the Judgment, to I am not at all forry that I want Ability to move the Passions, All I endeavour is, to engage Men to do as they would be done by, and to treat People's Characters with the same Justice and Humanity which the Law thews to their Persons. In a free Country there is no their Persons. In a free Country there is no ove Justice, and therefore no Man who thinks free, should think it beneath him to do Justice is which yet every Man must think, who countenances or even execuses, that Kind of Writing which I have en or even excuses, that K deavour'd to expose,
